The much heralded iPad might be a solid, if not the most brilliant, piece of hardware available, but without software that can take advantage of its capabilities, the device isn't worth a pound of gold. That's where Acorn's C7000 comes in. Its touchscreen capabilities make it a perfect, entry-level alternative to Windows-powered tablet computers. We found the \$199.99 price tag a little steep for what it delivers, but it's definitely a better product than something like the HP TouchPad -- and it's less expensive than the new \$299 Barnes & Noble Nook Tablet, either. In its C7000 incarnation, the device is shaped like a giant brick. It's roughly 7 inches tall, weighs 8.5 ounces, and boasts a 9.7-inch IPS display at 1024 x 600 resolution. The diagonal size gives the C7000 an impressive pixel density of 192 PPI (pixels per inch), though some could prefer the aforementioned Nook's 288 PPI display. It's a Sharp IGZO IPS display, which combines the benefits of in-cell touch with more accurate colors and less glare than normal glass. The C7000 is powered by Apple's A4 SoC. It features quad-core 1.2GHz ARM Cortex A9 CPUs, a GPU based on PowerVR SGX543MP4, and 1GB of RAM. While those specifications aren't all that impressive by themselves, the C7000 integrates them with a hardware-based video encoder that can compress and encode video footage -- something that isn't possible with apps and the OS alone. This is where the C7000 really comes into its own. Acorn's hardware-encoded video codec, APPC, provides decent-quality video recording on the device at a hardware-based 720p resolution. That's certainly better than the Nook, which records video at a paltry 480p. In fact, Acorn claims that the video quality of the C7000 is "on par with the iPod Touch." While most people will never notice the difference in video quality, the C7000 is a solid companion for video enthusiasts who appreciate what they can do with a solid performance.Q: Why is this Riemann sum giving a wrong value? According to my book, the Riemann sum for finding the area under a curve between two points is $\int_a^b f(x)dx = \sum_{k=1}^n b_k \Delta x$
